Abstract

Many multinational organisations fail to fully employ the capabilities of their local staff, particularly those in sensitive roles, such as security and logistics positions. It is commonplace to rely on expatriate staff for many of these roles, and this practice is particularly prevalent in the resource industry in Papua New Guinea. This research first aimed to determine whether this reliance on expatriates does exist, and, if so, why this situation occurs. It then examined how resource companies operating in Papua New Guinea manage and develop their national logistics and security workforce, and how nationalisation or workforce indigenisation occurs in this context.

This research employed a mixed-methods approach, combining a case study, 10 qualitative interviews with industry experts, and a survey of 102 industry respondents. Purposive sample selection was used throughout the research, with participants drawn predominantly from leadership roles in industry.

The research findings were able to confirm conclusively that there is a dependence built on expatriate staff in the resource industry. The findings also demonstrated that earlier workforce nationalisation is possible, and that it would bring a cost benefit. The findings also conclusively proved that an organisation achieving earlier workforce nationalisation would receive considerable reputational benefits as a result. More importantly, this research discovered that the key to early successful workforce nationalisation is based around mentoring. Mentoring programs that are supported by senior management, are funded and aim to exist in the long term must be underpinned by four supporting elements: strong human resources, cultural awareness, engagement, and training and development.

All this research was consolidated into developing a new workforce nationalisation model. The development of this theoretical roadmap or model through the conclusive results found in the research should empower the resource industry in Papua New Guinea to transform current practices and theory on workforce nationalisation in the security and logistical fields. The primary reason for undertaking this study was to advance the current body of knowledge on indigenous workforce nationalisation.
programs in logistics and security among resource organisations in Papua New Guinea, and it has been well proven that this occurred.
I would like to thank my supervisor, Lanny Entrekin, for his guidance, support and work throughout this research—your efforts have been well above and beyond. I would like to thank my co supervisor, Peter Gall, and the other professors who contributed to the research.

I would also like to thank Laurie Dickie and Mike Fazey for their support in the early days of my research, as well as the research office at Notre Dame and the School of Business.

I would like to thank my family for their patience and support—my two children, Hannah and Em; my wife, Marie; my parents, Ray and Jeanette; and my extended family.

Thank you to my colleagues and friends who helped push me along over the years, both in the army and out.

To John Pundari and Frank Jack, as well as your families in Papua New Guinea, thank you for your ongoing support and friendship—it is much appreciated.

To my friends and colleagues from Papua New Guinea with whom I have had the honour of working over the years, I dedicate this research to you and hope it works in some small way to help move things forwards.
